Chapter 4

need for new methodologies of analysis in Islamic studies. In his work, Arkoun emphasizes the history of mentalities, especially what Arkoun calls the unthought and unthinkable in the history of Muslims. These unthinkables stand as stumbling blocks preventing Muslim cultures from accurately describing reality before proceeding to interpret it.<sup>15</sup> I argued that besides the unthought and unthinkable, we ought to focus on the forgotten in Islamic history or what was never learned in the first place. The point I was making is that before we can explain, leave alone interpret, the historical mentalities of Muslims, it is critical that we engage the Islamic experience at the level of its microdiscourses. Especially when it comes to Shari'ah, it is critical that before speaking of juridical mind-sets in Islam, we decipher the microdynamics of the legal discourse. Only then would it be possible to begin to understand, explain, and interpret the historical experience and its meanings. I completely agreed with Arkoun's celebration of comparative knowledge as key to possessing the ability to explain historical and social phenomena. But I did have reservations about the ideological bias of phenomenological studies (the study of consciousness and experience) and, as I put it back then, "the dogma of deconstructing dogma." I learned a great deal from Arkoun and greatly admired his remarkable humility and graciousness. I got the impression that Arkoun was interested in a different set of questions or, I should say, in a different way of asking a different set of questions. However, at one point, Arkoun did wonder out loud whether a scientific approach to what he called Islamology could reach the average educated Muslim and induce a paradigm shift—a new way of thinking. A response jumped out of my mouth before I could really discern it—I said: "Professor, those who do not believe in scientific approaches to Islam will always win because they are always willing to display their piety—while we begin with being out of context because we insist that piety is purely a private matter." I think my hasty response surprised Arkoun, and judging by the fact that we drove to the train station in silence, he seems to have been disappointed.

This is not the place to discuss all the ways that this meeting had left a deep impact on me. Coming early on in my career, it helped me to define the way I thought and pursued my own intellectual project, and I found myself revisiting this conversation many times. There are many reasons that the intellectual project in Europe struggled with memory and tradition, often swinging back and forth between what borders on triumphalism and exaggerated deconstructionism. But it seemed to me to be deeply flawed for a Muslim insider hoping to pursue reform to simply transplant a heuristic apparatus from the West onto a different context with a different set of worries and concerns. Before being able to interrogate their memory from deconstructive perspectives, the Western intellectuals first felt that they owned this history. It is only the sense of confidence in controlling and directing their history that allowed Western intellectuals the confidence to challenge and undo that history. Muslims stand in a very different position. Muslims have been struck by a colonially induced amnesia toward their collective memory, and whatever they have been able to rehabilitate of that memory in the postcolonial age has been heavily influenced by the fact that all power is weighed heavily in favor of the former colonizers. Put differently, all attempts at rehabilitating historical memory (as opposed to traditional mythology) has been heavily
